MY SOMETIME SWEETHEART.

I do not know what her name may be, But, sure as the skies are bluz above. Somewhere in the world she walts for me— She who will one day be my love. She who will one day be my love.

Now, this moment, perhaps she wonders.

Who is here in the lonesome lands.

On the other side of the sea that sunders.

Our eyes and our lips and our hearts and our

But there is a place where the waters narrow—
There is a point where the margins meet:
And in the morning of some glad morrow
We shall press the isthmus with fated feet.
Though she be with a thousand I will know her
How can I fail to find her, when
Tu-day my heart to my thought can show her
As she must be now—as she will be then!

And she is as fulr as the fairest fair: She is as true as the truest truth: Pure as purity—holy as prayer— Her heart kept fresh in the faith of youth;

With a sunny gayety ever sheening In eyes that can sparkle with wilders fun— Or sober to tears and earnest meaning. When tears are timely and laughter done. I pray to meet her with soul unsuilled,
As here will be—with a heart untern—
Like a fallow field all gashed and guilled,
Where passion's torrents their ways have

Can I faiter and fait beyond retrieval.

With the thought of my lady to deter, Then all that is base and impure and evil, Goes out of my heart when I think of her? My dream -sweetheart! for in dreams I see he And hear the awnep of her dainty dress.

While a fair arm falls, with a furtive fear, Around my neck in a soft caress; feel her breath as she bends above me-

LOVE UP TO DATE.

The Queer Caprices of a Bociety Girl's Heart.

The same old thing, harkee! It had been going on for two months. She tradition. Her thirty-six points were mimpeachable. She was as lovely as a dream. Rich father, had every social advantage; stood five feet seven in her French slippers. Her hair was the color of a hickory nut just out of the shell; her eyes were like a wet turquoise and had delicious ghosts in them. When she was dressed in a close-fitting suit and had her leather belt on your arm began to describe involuntary curves. Succinctly, she was a beauty and a belle, and she lived on Murray Hill.

Parents, conservative, benignant, exemplary, literal Income about thirty housand dollars. Belonged to an unexceptional set. Brought up the beauty guardedly, almost acrupulously, and, withal, indulgently. They really thought it would be better for her to marry happily than brilliantly. They let on the available and impressionable men as soon as she was nineteen. Let me see; there was de fluyster, of the yacht club. He went all to pieces at that rendezvous at Newport. He saw her from his own yacht. She was standing on the deck of the commolore's vessel in a blue suit with a aunty little navy cap on and she seemed to focus all the bright elements of oxygen and the sea air and sunshine hat were loose that day. De Huyster laid formal and formidable siege. A lot of fellows fell back at his approach and said savagely that they had no show. De Huyster was worth three undred and fifty thousand dollars and had large expectations. Besides, he was a swell and had a jet black mus-There was nothing on the record better than the de Huysters and was the handsomest couple on the the lifted him up tenderly, gave him her cologne and stopped taking lessons on the harp.

Snoggleson came later. He wrote her etters with "Snoggleson & Snoggleson, Importers," printed across the top. Snoggleson was bald-headed and a bachelor. He had some excellent characteristics. He remembered when the Astor house was built, and he read the able editorials on tin plate manufacture in the papers every day in the year. He was what the boys called "solid and safe," and he could play backgammon with the beauty's father in the library long after the beauty had gone to bed. Old Wood Pulque, his father, was worth about five million dollars. Young Pulque was the only heir. He put Lucille on his re-served list of available women to marry when he got through sowing his wild oats. He had a mine in Colorado and a horse in New Jersey named after her. He paid her attentions at a water-place, and had his sister send her father invitations for all the Pulque receptions. In addition to those avowed admirers there was Dr. Meredith Mellowtone of St. Sophia's and Charley Dartover, of Amherst, and the brilliant cosnopolite, Ben Huyling, who could make a Weish rarebit and play on the cornet and called his den a "studio," and dabbied in oils.
